The U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics projects that sales employment will grow faster than the average for all occupations through 2012. CareerBuilder.com saw first hand the growing popularity of sales positions in 2004 with the number of sales jobs posted on its site nearly doubling year over year to more than 70,000. Looking to the near future, sales has been identified as one of the top three areas companies will be recruiting for in 2005 by more than 1,000 hiring managers surveyed by CareerBuilder.com in November and December.

DePaul became the first Chicago university to offer a specific concentration in sales management in June 2004 with the launch of its Sales Leadership Program. The program provides students with a strong foundation in communication and selling techniques that leads to a bachelor-of-science degree in marketing, with a sales concentration. Students take a core curriculum of business and liberal arts courses and four specialized courses in sales and sales management.

"DePaul has assembled key resources to drive our Sales Leadership Program and are building on our success with the addition of the number one job site to our corporate partners," said David Hoffmeister, the program's director of corporate relations. "With partners such as CareerBuilder.com supporting our efforts, we are delivering a unique program with exceptional training and job placement for one of the most sought after occupations in the country."

"Our partnership with DePaul, an institution acclaimed for academic excellence, provides a mutually beneficial experience," said Matt Ferguson, CareerBuilder.com's CEO. "CareerBuilder.com has direct access to insights in sales from an academic perspective while DePaul has access to our hands-on knowledge from a market perspective. Sharing and applying our experiences, we are helping to build stronger sales candidates to support the goals of today's and tomorrow's businesses."
